Risk type Electric shock
Fire

Legal provisions (at EU level) and European standards against which the product was tested and did not comply The product poses a risk of electric shock because: - The cover and the bulb can be removed by hand when the night-light is plugged into a mains socket outlet. As a result, live parts can be touched during bulb replacement; - The pins of the adaptor do not have an insulating collar. The structure of the adaptor enables single-pole insertion of the plug. As a result, live parts are accessible; - The lamp holder is not properly insulated and the live lamp cap can be touched during normal use; The product poses a risk of fire because the plastic casing of the luminaire (includes conductive parts) is made of combustible material. In addition, the product is not accompanied with warnings for safety use. The product does not comply with the requirements of the Low Voltage Directive and the relevant European standard EN 60598.
